France is an indivisible, secular, democratic and social Republic. It ensures the equality of all of its citizens before the law. It is respectful of all beliefs.

Secularism promotes a form of citizenship which balances individual freedom with equality and freedom for all in the public interest.

The Republic ensures each of these principles is adhered to in schools.

Secularism in schools provides the conditions for pupils to shape their personality, exercise their free will and learn about citizenship. It protects them against any proselytism or pressures which could prevent them from making their own choices.

Secularism gives pupils access to a common and shared culture.

Secularism in schools offers lessons that are equal and non-denominational. In order to ensure pupils are given the most objective perspective possible in terms of different ways of seeing the world and the range and accuracy of knowledge, no subject is excluded from scientific and pedagogical discussion. No pupil may dispute a teacher’s right to teach a topic on the syllabus on the basis of a religious or political conviction.

Secularism means rejecting all violence and discrimination. It safeguards gender equality and is based on a culture of respect for others and mutual understanding.

It is the responsibility of all staff to share with pupils the meaning and the value of secularism, as well as the other fundamental principles of the Republic. They enforce these principles within the school setting. It is their responsibility to make parents aware of this charter.

Staff have a strict duty of neutrality: in performing their duties, they must not show their political or religious convictions.

In state schools, the rules of conduct in various areas, set out in the rules and regulations, are respectful of secularism. It is prohibited for pupils to wear signs or clothes which conspicuously show their religious affiliation.

In their thinking and activities, pupils help to breathe life into secularism within their school.
